MEDIA RELATIONS, OFFICE OF: Records, 1981-1989

Office History

The Office of Media Relations was responsible for all press relations except the White House Press Corps. This involved press briefings, press conferences for regional and local media, arranging interviews for regional media, and sending out video clips for local newscasts.

At various times it also included the “television office” responsible for the recordings of Presidential video/audio-taped messages and assisting with the actual technical set-ups for outside broadcast crews.

These different functions were carried out under several office permutations and office names throughout the Reagan administration. Since most of the staff and their physical location remained the same throughout the eight years, we have gathered all of this material under the title of the Office of Media Relations.

Originally, providing liaison services to non-regular White House press was handled by a subset of the Press Secretary’s Office entitled Media Liaison. Its director was Lou Gerig, an associate of Press Secretary James Brady. His staff included Sue Mathis (later Mathis-Richard) and Linda Perryman. Simultaneously, the Office of Communications contained the “Television Consultant to the President,” Mark Goode and Media Coordinator, Jan Mahan (later Mahan-Duval). Goode and Mahan handled the recorded activities of the President. This consisted of taping messages for various events the President could not attend, public service announcements, interviews and the President’s weekly radio address. In addition, they provided the television service or coordinated the needs of external television organizations. Their activities included audio and video, political and non-political recordings and working with recordings for the First Lady.

After the assassination attempt on the President, and the resulting serious injury to Press Secretary James Brady, it became necessary to make adjustments in handling the media and the construction of the Press Secretary’s office. Larry Speakes and Karna Small (later Small-Stringer) were both Deputy Press Secretaries at the time of Brady’s injury. Speakes was made Principal Deputy Secretary for the Press Office. The Office of Media Liaison was moved from the Press Secretary’s Office, and became a sub-office of the Office of Communications. Karna Small was made the Director of Media Relations and Planning and Lou Gerig became her Deputy Director. The television office functions became Small’s responsibilities, although it appears to have been handled almost exclusively by Mahan and Goode. In addition, the newly constituted office appears to have taken the responsibility of the Speaker’s Bureau. The Library found no documents related to the Speaker’s Bureau within this collection.

While serving as Director of Media Relations and Planning, Small also became a consultant to the National Security Council on media relations. In 1984, both Karna Small and Jan Mahan-Duval left the Office of Media Relations.

The office went through some short term solutions, but it was eventually decided to separate the television/recording functions into the Office of Television and to promote Sue Mathis-Richard to Director of the Office of Media Relations. Elizabeth Board was hired as Director of the Television Office. Both offices were ultimately reporting to the Office of Communications. At this time the Office of Media Relations continued as a the point of contact for all non-White House press corps inquiries, arranging media coverage for other White House office evetns, especially the Office of Public liaison and the Office of Political Affairs, working with national magazines, and providing regional briefings for local media from selected areas of the country.

Mathis-Richard left the White House in September 1987 and the television functions and media relations were recombined. Elizabeth Board became the Director of Media and Broadcast Relations. This was the final organization of these functions in the White House.

The Office of Media Relations, in all its manifestations, was always a small office with limited staff, supplemented with several interns providing administrative support.

The material for this office has been arranged in eight series:
